The Last Ten Yards — blog and channel plan

Signed Joshua. Walks the thread from the bar door to the lake. Public; nothing institutional, nothing from the vault, no third party named.

Name: The Last Ten Yards (series inside Joshua Says). Premise, one line: every service fails in the final gap between it and a person, and the mountain West is where that gap is widest — so that is where it gets closed first. Format: one written post and one 6–9 minute video per episode; the post is the script with the sources; the video is the post read over maps, numbers on cards, and the depot as it changes. Cadence: one a week. 0! on “until I get to the lake”: read as the data lake — the episode where the fleet’s own telemetry lands and the loop closes. If a literal lake, say so and the last episode changes.

#	Episode	The one number on the card
1	The last ten yards	11,904 — 2024 alcohol-impaired deaths, U.S.
2	Why here — ten states	34% — Utah DUI arrests outside the Wasatch Front
3	Closing time	6 p.m.–1 a.m., Fri–Sun — when Utah’s alcohol crashes happen
4	The road the road runs on — the satellite	miles of I-80 with no signal (to measure)
5	Who pays — the state, the venue, the rider	one alcohol-related fatal crash, in dollars
6	The depot — a roof, a battery, sixteen bays	80 kW (illustration until the roof is measured)
7	The first car	$41 a night
8	The measurement contract	one pre-registered metric
9	Pharmadash — medicine first, everything after	the last ten yards, in feet
10	The tile — the same idea at a child’s height	20–22 inches
11	The fleet — van, semi, VTOL	(his)
12	The lake	the first quarter’s number, the state’s

The origin line. Episode 1 has one line in it that only he can write: the night the last ten yards failed. The post ships without it or with it; his call, his words, and it is a public statement of a personal fact — the gate stops here and hands it to him.
